

Point of View

Read closely for evidence of point of view.

Is it first person, third person omniscient, third person limited, or third person objective?

It was early. Way too early for John to be bounding out of bed, racing down the hallway, and leaping onto his sleeping parents. But he did it anyway. He hurtled himself into his parents' quiet bedroom, shouting, "It's my birthday! It's my birthday!"

His mind was full of racing thoughts. Enormous packages to open. Monstrous slices of chocolate cake piled high with frosting. A house full of people visiting just for him. His mouth watered with the thought of birthday ice cream sundaes as he squealed, "When do we eat cake? When do we open presents?"

"Uh-oh," thought John's mom. She knew she still had to buy his special gift: a new cherry-red bike. But there were things to finish around the house before she could sneak away to the toy store.

"That's a long way off, mister," his mother said. "Your party isn't until tonight, and we have plenty of things to do to get ready before your guests arrive. The first thing you should do is go wash up and we can have some birthday pancakes."

John pretended to grumble, but he was actually looking forward to some special birthday flapjacks, hot off the griddle.

Clues:

This is written in _____ point of view. I know this because

Point of View

Read closely for evidence of point of view.

Is it first person, third person omniscient, third person limited, or third person objective?

It was early. Way too early for me to be bounding out of bed, racing down the hallway, and leaping onto my sleeping parents. But I did it anyway! I hurtled myself into my parent' quiet bedroom, shouting, "It's my birthday! It's my birthday!"

My parents slowly woke from their slumber as I squealed, "When do we eat cake? When do we open presents?"

"That's a long way off, mister," my mother said. "Your party isn't until tonight, and we have plenty of things to do to get ready before your guests arrive. The first thing you should do is go wash up and we can have some birthday pancakes."

I pretended to grumble, but I was actually looking forward to some special birthday flapjacks, hot off the griddle.

Clues:

This is written in _____ point of view. I know this because

Point of View

Read closely for evidence of point of view.

Is it first person, third person omniscient, third person limited, or third person objective?

It was early. John hurtled himself into his parents' quiet bedroom, shouting, "It's my birthday! It's my birthday!"

Then he squealed, "When do we eat cake? When do we open presents?"

"That's a long way off, mister," his mother said. "Your party isn't until tonight, and we have plenty of things to do to get ready before your guests arrive. The first thing you should do is go wash up and we can have some birthday pancakes."

John grumbled, but he went to wash up before he ate his special birthday flapjacks, hot off the griddle.

Clues:

This is written in _____ point of view. I know this because

Point of View

Read closely for evidence of point of view.

Is it first person, third person omniscient, third person limited, or third person objective?

It was early. Way too early for John to be bounding out of bed, racing down the hallway, and leaping onto his sleeping parents. But he did it anyway. He hurtled himself into his parents' quiet bedroom, shouting, "It's my birthday! It's my birthday!"

His mind was full of racing thoughts. Enormous packages to open. Monstrous slices of chocolate cake piled high with frosting. A house full of people visiting just for him. His mouth watered with the thought of birthday ice cream sundaes as he squealed, "When do we eat cake? When do we open presents?"

"That's a long way off, mister," his mother said. "Your party isn't until tonight, and we have plenty of things to do to get ready before your guests arrive. The first thing you should do is go wash up and we can have some birthday pancakes."

Clues:

This is written in _____ point of view. I know this because
